ful and wonderful devotion. A few names of persons and localities have been changed and some passages bearing too intimately upon certain events, have been omitted; otherwise the letters are presented in the shape in which they were originally written. The idea is to tell the tragic story of this woman's love without indicating it more fully at the present

The Evening World prints the letters by permission of the Chiswick Publishing Company, of this city, which will issue them in book form, We will give $100 to the first person who discovers the identity of the author.

JUST A LITTLE TAPLEY.

Every man has a touch of Peck sniff in him, to say nothing of a few women I could traine, and that is Cruikshank's illustrations of "Mar-tin Chuzziewit," and the result is dellatiful to the Dickens lovers who flock to Mr. Willard's standard. But Mr. Volpe lacks unction. If he and Mr. Willard could change voices. Mark Tapley appears in the person of Mr. Ernest Stallard. He hasn't much opportunity to distinguish himself, and he doesn't make the best use of it, but faithful audiences laugh dutifully over the well-remembered Dickens speeches.

Miss Mand Hoffman plays the in-sipid heroine, Mary Graham. She characterize:

Miss Blingham was engaged in the truly Napoleonic undertaking of launching a new stock company in a new play, all under her own exclusive and individual direction, at the same time taking a leading part herself in the acting of her piece. That Miss Blingham has nerve was shown by the company she presented, which was really remarkable.

For three acts, with the skill of a Japanese juggler, he kept them all going and the delight of the splendid first-night nudlence was expressed in repeated calls for both the actors and repeated calls for both the actors and had got his characters into such a situation that only the rather tedious death of Mr. Worthing could release them, and the final effect was depressing.
